National Science Foundation – Course, Curriculum, and Laboratory Improvement

The CCLI program is based on a cyclic model of the relationship between knowledge production and improvement of practice in undergraduate STEM education. In this model, research findings about learning and teaching challenge existing approaches, leading to new educational materials and teaching strategies. New material and teaching strategies that show promise lead to faculty development programs and methods that incorporate these materials. The most promising of these developments are first tested in limited environments and then implemented and adapted in diverse curricula and educational practices. These innovations are carefully evaluated by assessing their impact on teaching and learning. In turn, these implementations and assessments generate new insights and research questions, initiating a new cycle of innovation.

At this time, NSF is funding two types of projects:

- Phase 2: Expansion Projects – total budget up to $500,000 for 2 to 4 years. Phase 2 projects build on smaller-scale successful innovations or implementations and refine and test these on diverse users in several settings. In terms of scope, their focus ordinarily includes two or more components of the cyclic model with the connections between components explicitly addressed. Phase 2 projects carry the development to a state where the results are conclusive so that successful products and processes can be distributed widely or commercialized when appropriate.
- Phase 3: Comprehensive Projects – total budget up to $2,000,000 for 3 to 5 years. Phase 3 projects combine established results and mature products from several components of the cyclic model. Such projects involve several diverse academic institutions, often bringing different kinds of expertise to the project. Evaluation activities are deep and broad, demonstrating the impact of the project's innovations on many students and faculty at a wide range of academic institutions. Dissemination and outreach activities that have national impact are an especially important element of Phase 3 projects, as are the opportunities for faculty to learn how to best adapt project innovations to the needs of their students and academic institutions.

Although it is expected that some Phase 1 projects will lead to Phase 2 projects and some Phase 2 projects to Phase 3 projects, there is no requirement that a proposal be based on CCLI-funded work. Application deadline: January 24, 2006.
